Brooklyn, NY — An outdoor art exhibition of work by six artists is on view, displayed on the fence surrounding St. Ann & the Holy Trinity Church in Brooklyn Heights. This collaboration with FiveMyles and KODA represents a shift from indoor to outdoor events for the Forum @ St. Ann’s and is the first new project in its arts and culture series since the pandemic. The exhibit enhances the neighborhood landscape and engages community members and passersby on a busy commercial street in Downtown Brooklyn.

The paintings, drawings and photographs are printed on 8 ft W x 2.5 ft H vinyl banners that are attached to the individual sections of the metal fence surrounding the church on Montague Street in Brooklyn. The Footprints on Montague exhibition aims to give the passing public moments of pleasure and emotional retreat in the midst of the noise of city life. Inspiring the viewers to reflect upon their individual experience, their place in the community, and on this planet. The installations show drawings of subway scenes, words for thought, prints made from the marriage of painting and photography, photographic portraits of the people we are, and an installation of digitally collaged, and cut out, migratory birds mounted directly on the fence.

“St. Ann’s is delighted and so grateful for this partnership with FiveMyles and KODA that revives the Forum @ St. Ann’s and showcases the work of six extraordinary Brooklyn-based artists. Footsteps on Montague will lift the spirits of our neighbors and amplify the commitment of our historic church to foster artistic expression when it is so deeply needed. It is an investment in the hope of art to carry us through this dark and challenging time.” - The Rev. Canon John Denaro, rector of St. Ann & the Holy Trinity Church

The exhibition is curated by Hanne Tierney, the director and founder of FiveMyles, an exhibition and performance space in Crown Heights, and Klaudia Ofwona Draber, the director and founder of KODA, a social practice residency for mid-career artists.

Jess Frederick
The artist’s drawings of subway scenes show the familiar in a surprisingly unfamiliar manner. Her deftly nervous lines pass on the quiet moments of a subway rider going from point A to B. In the drawing of a deconstructed subway colors give the car the playfulness of a toy.

Madi Dangerously
With an enigmatic self-portrait and written words, the poet and spoken word artist invites the viewers to an introspective experience, encouraging an inquiry: ...ask yourself how am I living.
Ann Rosen
The photographer shows the strong black and white portraits of friends and neighbors taken during the pandemic. She used a 1969 Rolleiflex camera that allowed to take these portraits with a close-up lens. These faces highlight a sitter’s pensive uncertainty and an open smile for being in the present.

Nina Melenandri
The artist’s prints are a fusion of painting and photography. As the artist phrases it: “the power of their impact rests in the haunting, tiny, almost subliminal space somewhere in between its two components that have become one.”

Tatiana Arocha
Site-specific installation with birds perched on the metal bars of one fence section. The artist refers to the phenomena of birds, who, during their migration to warmer climates, are blown off course. Due to climate change, increasingly erratic weather patterns have brought flocks of foreign birds to NYC.

Hidemi Takagi
In her community-based photography project, the artist created a pop-up photo studio in her front yard, and offered free portraits to long time Brooklyn-residents, with selected props and add ons, to create unique portraits of her neighbors in Bedford-Stuyvesant, bringing out everyone’s superstar qualities.
